Talking Points in Support of Patent Extension for Drugs Used in Pediatrics

- Many drugs used in children have not been well-studied in children. For a number of reasons, including lack of incentives, few clinical trials used to support a New Drug Application are conducted on children. Instead, doctors often rely on mathematical calculations to figure out the dosage of a medication. Treating children as "small adults" is not reliable and, for drugs where small variations in the dose can cause large variations in response, may be dangerous. From the standpoint of children and those who treat them, this situation is unsatisfactory.

- A solution does exist to narrow this gap in pediatric research. Pharmaceutical companies should receive incentives to conduct pediatric research when a pediatric indication is not the primary indication for which the drug is developed and approved. The most effective incentive is the granting of additional market exclusivity, through extension of a product's patent.

- In the case of a drug awaiting FDA approval, six months of additional exclusivity would be given to that product if the sponsor submits the information necessary for pediatric labeling.

- For a drug already on the market, whether currently on-patent or not, six months of exclusivity would be granted to a product of the sponsor's choice, provided that the sponsor submitted the necessary information for pediatric labeling of a drug for which the Secretary of Health and Human Services determines additional pediatric information is necessary. This six-month extension would apply one time only, and a marketed product would receive only one such patent extension. Allowing the sponsor to choose such a drug is necessary because little incentive exists to do research on a drug whose market exclusivity is nearing its end or has ended.

- These new incentives would stimulate private R&D spending and would promptly research to make pediatric therapy current and scientific, as opposed to the current guesswork that is the norm when doctors prescribe pharmaceuticals to children.

- Children deserve to benefit fully from the scientific advances made by the pharmaceutical industry, and to have their specific medical needs recognized and met. This proposal improves the health of children by giving those who treat them the most complete information possible.
