FEC FORM 2

(revised 1/2001)

Not to be stubbo

Ann Landers

Dear Ann Landers: In a recent column, you described a man who was determined to have his own way as "stubborn as a mule." Actually, Ann, mules are not stubborn. They are highly intelligent animals. When ordered to do something they perceive to be potentially harmful to themselves, they appear to be stubborn. Mules have a strong sense of self-preservation and cannot be forced to risk themselves to death, unlike horses.

The mule is the most underappreciated, neglected domestic animal in the country. Their service in the U.S. Army alone has earned them respect they have never been granted. More than 500,000 mules served the allied armies in World War I and II. Thousands of mules were killed in action. The American Legion considers those mules to be veterans.

You owe an apology to our long-ignored servants.

—John Hauer, president,
Mule Riders of America, Bountiful, Utah

Dear John Hauer: I apologize to all the mules whose shelleys I hurt by focusing on their alleged stubbornness. Little did I know that the American Legion considers them veterans. Thanks for enlightening me.
